This course provides you with the background to contextualize contemporary debates about gender and sexuality in and about Muslim communities. We will do so in two chief ways. First, we will examine foundational sources of Islamic devotional traditions, including the Qur'an and - (traditions of the Prophet Muhammad), and explore the different ways that Muslim communities have engaged with those sources, such as scriptural commentary and Islamic law. Second, we will investigate gender and sexuality in Muslim communities from historical and anthropological perspectives, particularly as they bear on colonial histories and the complex ethics of contemporary cross-cultural analysis.

Of particular importance in the materials we will work with are the voices of contemporary Muslims, some of whom argue that Muslims must fundamentally reinterpret significant elements of Islamic traditions with an eye toward gender justice. At the same time, we will examine voices—those of men women—that will challenge the very heart of these claims about the nature of Islam. Working with a broad range of perspectives will provide us with insight into different ways in which Muslims understand what it means to be a man, what it means to be a woman, how men and women should relate to one another, how men and women understand and nurture the individual's (and society's) relationship with God, and what it means to be a sexual being in a manner God intended.

COURSE TEXTS

Leila Ahmed,

Aysha Hidayatullah,

Saba Mahmood, :

Carolyn Moxley Rouse,

Judith Tucker, .

These texts form the backbone of our course, but throughout the semester we will also be working with articles or excerpts from books. Some of these readings are accessible via "Library Resources" on our Blackboard course site, in which case they will have an “R” next to them on the syllabus, or on the course site itself, in which case they will have “pweb” next to them.

You can read scholarly sources with a few questions in mind:

- Can you identify a sentence or sentences that constitute the thesis statement?
- Can you state the author’s thesis—even regarding a single chapter or article—succinctly in your own words?
- If part of a larger work, how does a particular chapter or chapters fit into the bigger picture? If a stand-alone piece, can you relate this reading to another that we have completed in the course?
- Can you identify at least two examples the author uses to support her or his argument?
- How does the reading relate to the broader questions we discussed at the beginning of the course?

As you read the primary sources with which we will work, please keep the following questions in mind:

- Who is writing? What do you think was her or his purpose in so doing?
- What is the larger relevant context? (Beware of anachronistic analysis!)
- What is the author’s relative position of power in the context of the document’s production?
- How does this document support or call into question claims made by the authors of our secondary source?

From a skill-building perspective, then, two important learning goals of this course are (1) reading scholarly sources for argument and presenting that argument and the quality of your efforts in this regard plays a role in your participation grade, too. At the same time, nothing illustrates engagement like a willingness to be a vocal participant in our course. In the end, your (individual and collective) engagement with the course will be a significant determinant of what kind of experience we have together.

Individual Treatment: 5%

Early in the semester, you will write a treatment of a course reading. Your treatment should identify the thesis, provide an overview how the author supports her/his argument, and provide a question that remains for you about the work in question. This assignment will provide you with an opportunity to work on course learning goals relating to reading scholarly sources. At two pages in length (double-spaced), success on this assignment depends very much on concise writing and sound organization. This assignment will push you to work on the first two skill-based learning goals I note above.

Weekly Journal: 10%

Beginning with week three, you will be responsible for writing a weekly journal entry (approximately 250-300 words) relating to course readings and discussion. Your journal entries should be brief treatments of the readings built around the above “scholarly source” or “primary source” reading questions and should note something from readings or discussion that was of particular interest to you, that helped you grab onto some of the larger ideas or themes we discuss. I also encourage you to use the journal as a means of keeping track of your personal reflections on course material and discussion. I will not formally grade/comment on each of your journal entries (though I will be reading them), but the more time and effort you put into them the easier your reflection essays, which I describe below, will be. The “points of interest” from your journals will also figure centrally into your final reflection essay, and any personal reflection you do will make the final reflection essay easier. You will be responsible for completing a total of twelve journal entries. They should be complete by noon on Sunday. The journal is thus the foundation for a third learning goal in the course: developing the capacity to reflect on material over time, developing new understandings of things you have already learned based on new information or material.

Unit Reflections: 20%

You will be responsible for completing two two-page, single-spaced, reflection essays in the first half of the semester (10% each). Successful essays will make specific reference to your weekly journal entries and course materials, using your “points of interest” to reflect on how they illuminate core topics of the unit and of the course.

Discussion Leadership: 15%

We will close out the semester with student led class sessions. In groups of three, you will work with me to develop and execute a lesson plan for an entire class session. Over the course of the semester, I will employ a number of different pedagogical strategies in class sessions. Please take note of which ones work best for you—and why. This will likely influence what you and your group choose to do in planning your own class session. This exercise relates to a fourth learning goal, namely, how to work with others in planning an extended and interactive presentation of information.

Final Reflections: 15%

You will complete two-part, seven-page, double-spaced reflection essay for submission on the final day of classes. Part I will consist of a five-page essay drawing together course materials and themes. Successful essays will use at least five of the points of interest you articulated in your weekly journals to illuminate what you consider to be the course "thesis." Reflecting the larger liberal arts and humanistic settings for the course, Part II will consist of a two-page essay providing you with an opportunity for more personal reflection about how the course may or may not have affected the way you think about questions of gender. Specific reference to journal entries a plus.

Final Essay: 15%

Over the course of the semester, I would like for you to take note of news stories related to our course that catch your attention. You should keep a running log of the stories you select, and I highly suggest that you jot down a few sentences about why you chose what you chose. At mid-term, you will submit a bibliography of sources you have selected up until that point. (You will also submit a bibliography with your final essay.) Toward the end of the semester, you should have selected about 10 stories, and you will select three articles from reputable news sources about Muslim communities and/or Islamic devotional traditions and explain how these stories relate to our course. There should be a logic to your final selection of articles, meaning that you should be able to draw them together into a coherent discussion in your essay. In your essay, I would like for you to address in some fashion the following questions: How do the materials we have read help you understand these particular stories? What kinds of questions can you ask of the stories based on the work we have done together? Do the stories raise questions for you about the materials we have read/discussed as a class? This essay will be due by the end of finals week.

The format of this essay should be as follows: One single-spaced page summarizing the three articles, followed by approximately five pages of double-spaced analysis.

Course Policies:

- Email policy part I: I am generally good about returning email in a reasonable amount of time. Please always reach out to your colleagues first with logistical questions about our course; you can do so via the email function on the course site. If no one can figure out the answer, then by all means get in touch. You can always ask in class, too, and you will find that I am quite accessible outside of class. I'd much
